EDITOR'S NOTES	1
Steven M. Richardson
1. Incivility in Dyadic Teaching and Learning	3
Richard G. Tiberius, Edred Flak
The dynamics of the teacher-learner dyad shape the climate for civil discourse or for incivility.
2. Promoting Internal Civility: Understanding Our Beliefs About Teaching and Students	13
Sally L. Kuhlenschmidt
It is important for students and teachers to separate inferences and emotional beliefs from their behavioral responses to stressful situations.
3. Feelings from the Back Row: Negotiating Sensitive Issues in Large Classes	23
Corly Petersen Brooke
A teacher can anticipate discomfort when sensitive topics like human sexuality are in the course syllabus and can take creative steps to promote open and civil discourse.
4. Students Behaving Badly in Large Classes	35
Elisa Carbone
By adopting interactive methods and being sensitive to students' concerns, teachers can minimize uncivil behavior even in the largest classes.
5. Strategies for Dealing with Difficult Behavior	45
Sally L. Kuhlenschmidt, Lois E. Layne
Teachers can develop strategies for responding to incivility by recognizing the range of personal and environmental stresses that students face.
6. After the Eruption: Managing Conflict in the Classroom	59
Susan A Holton
The Holton Model for Conflict Management is a three-step approach to identifying, analyzing, and resolving serious conflicts in the classroom.
7. Faculty Responsibility for Promoting Conflict-Free College Classrooms	69
James A. Anderson
Faculty and students play important roles in maintaining a tension-free, democratic, and effective learning environment for a diverse student body.

8. Civility, Leadership, and the Classroom	77
Steven M. Richardson
Department chairs can model leadership skills that help faculty promote civility and respond appropriately to disruptive events.
9. The Prevention and Cure of Campus Disputes	87
Richard Hebein
Institutional approaches to alternative dispute resolution can offer students and faculty a safe, nonjudgmental environment for addressing disputes and promoting campus civility.
